Abstract:
Right to data privacy is an essential principle of human rights that is protected and guaranteed by Indonesia National Constitution. The development of technology allows personal data to be collected, processed, and published for different purposes. The focus of this paper is to acknowledge regulations on personal data protection and whether data processing of applicants on voluntary decision cases published through the Indonesia Supreme Court Decision Directory is carried out correctly. This paper employs normative legal approach which utilizes regulations relevant to personal data protection and analyze the normative substance with actual practice carried out by the Indonesia Supreme Court through its Decision Directory. This research finds Indonesia Supreme Court have not fully integrate personal data protection principles when publishing voluntary decision cases to Indonesia Supreme Court Decision Directory. Indonesia Supreme Court should enforce stricter measures and oversights when publishing voluntary decision which contain sensitive personal data of applicants to Indonesia Supreme Decision Directory.
